

DESIGN THINKING MINDSET / DISCOVER PHASE / SYNTHESIZE

Define a Persona

Create an archetype of your users from end user interviews to guide future design decisions.

Why To Define a Persona

“Personas” are user archetypes developed from research interviews. They encompass the users’ goals, desires, and tasks.

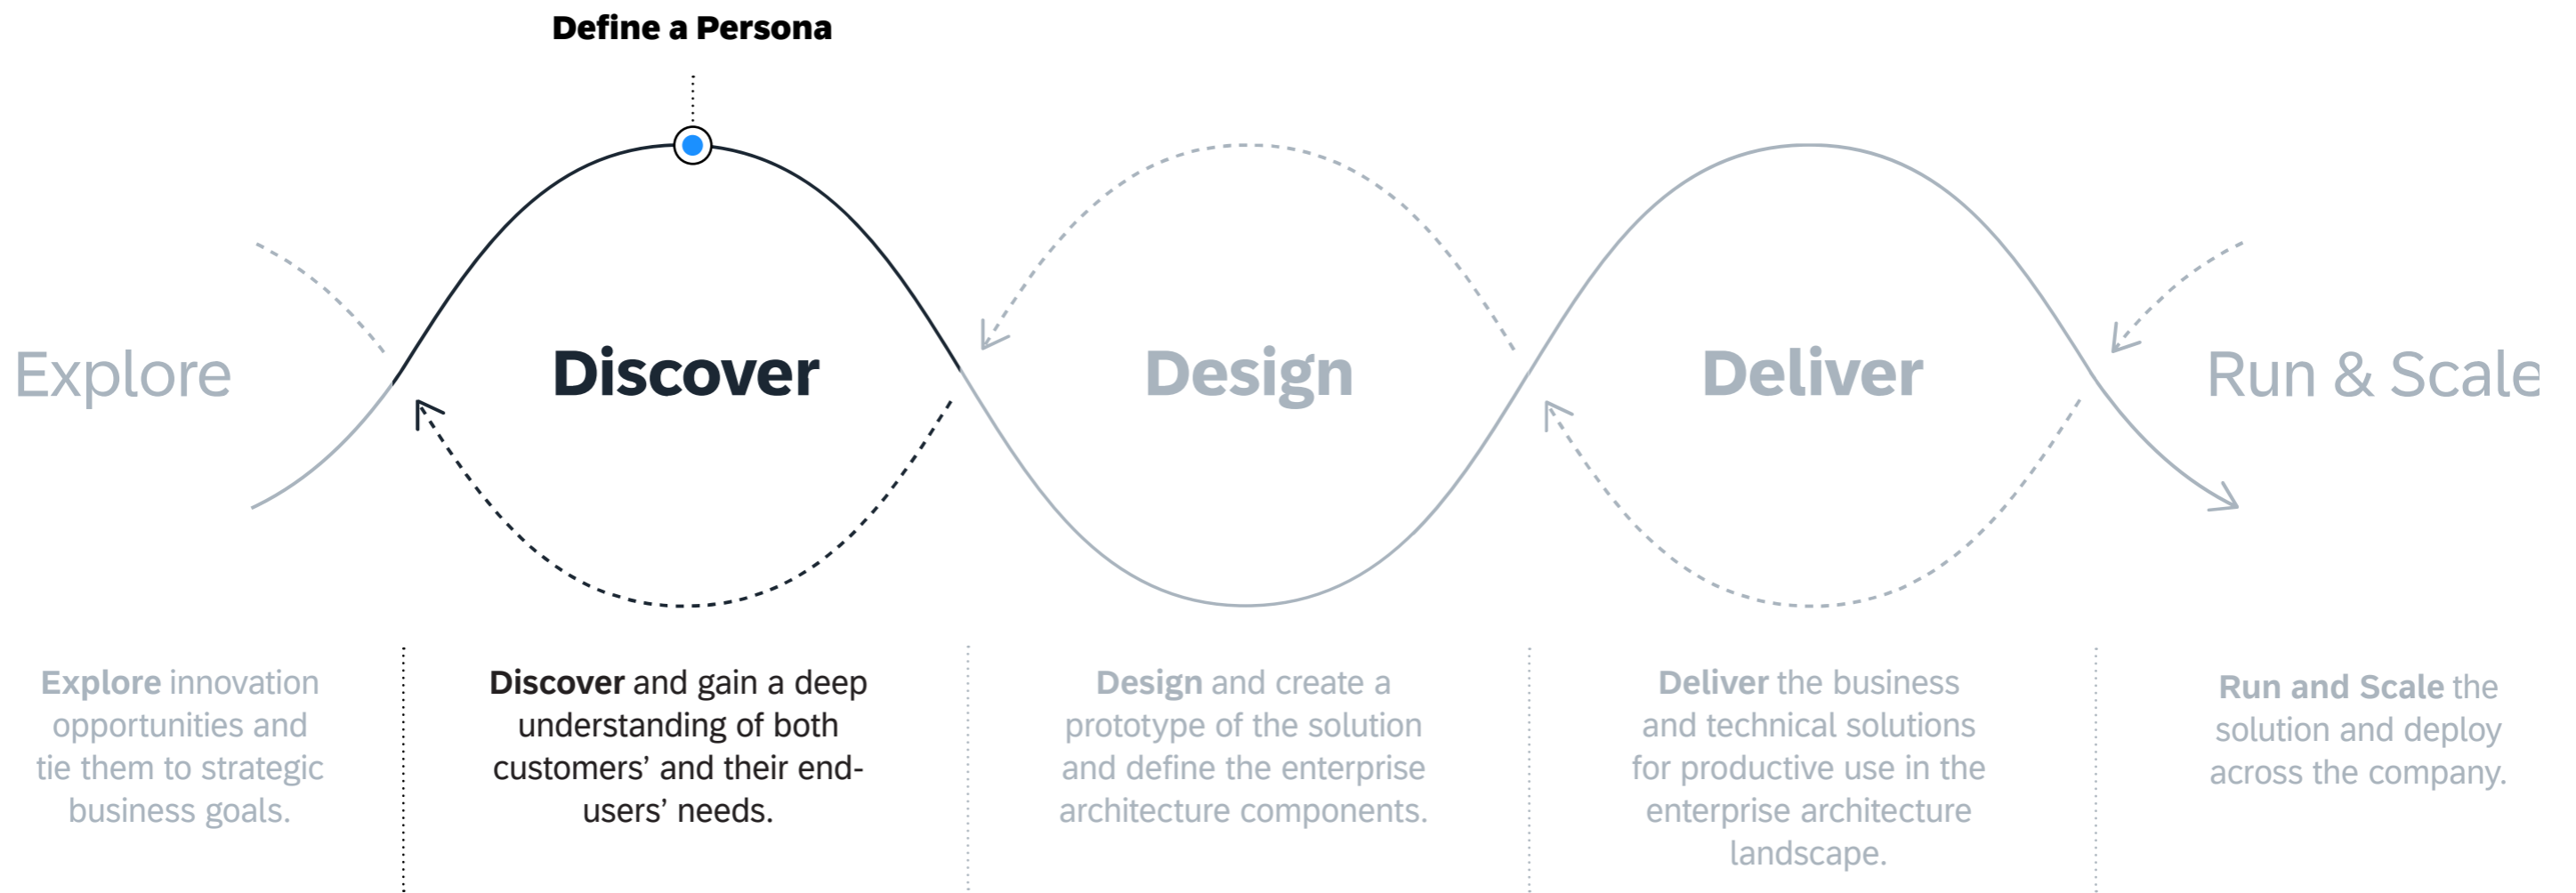

Personas help guide future design decisions by giving a human face to otherwise abstract data. They further help the team to have a common understanding of the end users.

When To Define a Persona

In the Discover Phase, personas are used to define a specific target user for the given challenge. Personas can be developed from interviewees' responses about their needs and goals, which may be experiential or professional, as well as short-term or long-term. Articulating these goals helps inform design decisions as the project progresses. A well-crafted persona serves as a North Star, guiding the team's decisions throughout the project.

Instructions

A persona is a "typical" but fictional user, which should be based on your research data. The persona template helps to make your research insights more tangible and guide design decisions.

Time Needed
ca 20-30 Minutes

Participants
5 - 6

How to use
Work through the different sections, starting with the Demographics. Add points you learned from the research and synthesis.

Tips for moderation
Create a realistic person, not a caricature which nobody will take serious. The better you emotionally can connect to the persona, the better. Everything should be based on your research results. Don't invent points.
